Will India be able to develop 30 Gigawatt-hour battery energy storage?

New Delhi is also targeting 236 gigawatt-hours of battery energy storage capacity by 2031-32 and announced a ₹54 billion (roughly $612 million) funding plan in June to develop 30 gigawatt-hour battery storage systems in the country. However, like many global markets, India faces a key challenge: China's dominance over the lithium supply chain.

Why will India pilot battery storage at coal-fired power plants?

India will pilot battery storage at coal-fired power plants to soak up surging midday solar and keep thermal capacity ready for the evening peak—without destabilizing the grid. The move targets a growing bind: solar now forces coal units to back down during the day, yet demand still leans on them after sunset.
